A Memorable Day in the History of the Old Colonial Capital of Virginia.

DR. T. N. PAGE'S ADDRESS

Virginia Author Makes Presentation of Gift of Washington Branch, A. P. V. A.

WILLIAMSBURG, VA., May 26 .- The ancient capital of the old mother Com-hood of the colonists in their bold step.

He then traced the development of the liberties of the people from a period antedating the Magna Charta, and then reviewed the history of the colonies and of their rights guaranteed them in the charter of James I., and the subsequent offerts of the crown to wrest from them liberties so long guaranteed. From this point he traced the progress of the revolutionary movement from its inception to its fruition, quoting liberally from Jefferson and other contemporary writers and publicists and from High Blair Gibsby and more recent historians.

The story of the struggle is interspersed with a number of digressions in the form of descriptions of the town of Yilliamsburg, incidents and anecdotes illustrative of the feeling existing at various times in this crucial period of the country's history. From the pasage of the Virginia resolutions to their transmission to Congress and the action of that body
Dr. Page shows great research into unwritten history, and draws from many sources, with infinite labor and pains, the facts bearing on the development of the Declaration of Independence.

In the concluding portion of the address the speaker turned his attention and addressed himself expecially to the students of the College of William and Mary, and urged them to labor to unbuild the college and strive to cause it to regain its ancient prestige and influence.

The speaker also appealed to Virginians ancient capital of the old mather Commonwealth will record this as a red day in its calendar. Seldom has the historic old city sheltered so many Virginia visitors or so many connected with the glories of her early history as were gathered here to-day to attend the ceromonies incident to the unveiling of a momorial tablet, commemorating the Virginia convention of 1776, and enrolling in lasting bronze the names of the authors of our liberties.

The city (for such it is by virtue of its royal charter) was thronged with guests and entertained them with a hospitality worthy of old Virginia's prestige. The historic buildings and sites, of the colonial capital were all thrown open to visitors, and Old Bruton Church, the Spotswood Powder Barn, the Eastern State Mospital, the College of William and Mary, the old colonial homes, the sites of the Raleigh and Red Lion Taverns and all the other hallowed spots were visited by the throngs from Richmond, Washington, Norfolk and Hampton.

The scene of the unveiling was the tender of the state of the unveiling was the tender.

The scene of the unveiling was the site of the first State Capitol, the old hall of the House of Burgess, at the foot of Duke of Gloucester Sirect. There, within the foundation walls of the old of Diske of Gloucester Street. There, within the foundation walls of the old House of Burgesses, was the memorial stone, a grant monolith with plates of broize, bearing the names of the early statesmen, who contributed so conspicuously to the building of the world's greatest republic.

Under An Elm's Shade.

The warm sunshine beat down upon the historic spot with midsummer fervor and forced the large assemblage to take shelter beneath the foliage of a greatelm near by. The speakers' stand had been created in the full glare of the sun, but Dr. Thomas Nelson Page asked that the removed to the shade of the sheltering tree, and this was done in a few moments. There, with speakers and hearers, gathered in primitive fashion in Nature's great temple, the exercises attending the unveiling were had. The breezes rippled the leaves overhead intermittently, and at times swayed the sturdy branches. The great discomfort was due to the fact that the greater portion of to the fact that the greater portion of the audience had to stand for three hours during the reading of the addresses. Nevertheless, all enjoyed the day, and, despite the length of Dr. Page's brilliant historical paper, the audience gave him close attention during the two hours and ten minutes consumed in its delivery, and applauded to the end when the sentiments of the speaker appealed especially to their patriotism pr pride, or aroused their enthusiasm by the recountal of the deeds of their forefathers on field and in forum.

The exercises were opened with prayer

At the conclusion of the address of Dr. Page. Dr. Tyler presented Mr. Joseph Bryan with a graceful culogy of his public services and his patriotism, and Mr. Bryan accepted the monumental tablet on behalf of the Virginia Society for the Preservation of Antiquities.

"I am under the constraint," said Mr. Bryan, "of condensing in a few words the sentiments of gratitude we all feel, and which I would express to the ladies of the Washington branch. Such a tribute, coming to our glorious mother from without her borders, excites sentiments of gratitude I find myself unable to express. If we indulged ourselves in speaking of Virginia's glorious part in the history of this republic we would have to hold a protracted meeting, with night sessions. It is true, indeed, that once a Virginian, always a Virginian. For those laddes who though not Virginian. on field and in forum.

The exercises were opened with prayer by Rev, W. A. R. Gbodwin, rector of old Bruton parish. Dr. Lyon G.
